Not illustrated. 1885 Excerpt: .canes is left to make a bow for the next year, and the other cut back to two buds, which produce two more upright canes, thus repeating the pro-cess. In very strong vines two or more bows may be left. Fig. 101 represents multiplied bow training, which is, perhaps, more ornamental than useful. the buds may all get an even start in the spring, the arms are sometimes bent down to the ground till the young shoots are a few inches long. When fastened to the trellis at once, the sudden bend near the base of the cane so checks the sap that the buds at that point are unduly developed, while the strong tendency of the sap to the extremity makes the buds there grow more rapidly Fig. 99. than those on the middle of the cane. See figures 98 and 99. When the two arms are fastened to the trellis, five or six buds are selected on the upper side of each, at which wires are placed. The wires are left so they can be moved to any desired position. When the young shoots are several inches long, they are tied to the wires and all other buds and shoots are rubbed off. To equalize the space, it is sometimes necessary to train up a bud from the bottom of the cane. The upright shoots are not allowed to reach much above the trellis, and the laterals are kept pinched back. The entire vine...
